SUMMARY

These data were collected to examine the background characteristics, attitudes, and reported behaviors of arrested clients of prostitutes, with particular attention to the issue of violence against women. Client intervention programs in four cities provided opportunities for gathering information from men arrested for trying to hire street prostitutes. For the study, a detailed anonymous questionnaire was administered to men before the beginning of every client intervention workshop in San Francisco, California, and Portland, Oregon. The questionnaire was also administered at a small program in Santa Clara, California, which was modeled after the San Francisco program. During the course of the study, the Portland program ceased operations and a new program began in Las Vegas, which became a significant source of data. Men were asked about their sexual behavior, including the number and type of partners, frequency of sex, interest in pornography, age and circumstances of first sexual encounter with a prostitute, sexual acts performed with prostitutes, and condom use with prostitutes. Clients were also asked about their attitudes toward premarital sex, homosexual sex, extramarital sex, and sex between adults and children. Other questions probed men's views about prostitutes, the legality of prostitution, and violence against women. Background information gathered on clients included race, educational level, sexual orientation, marital status, work status, socioeconomic status, age, parents' marital status, history of sexual or physical abuse, military service, relationship history, and sexual preferences.

PURPOSE OF THE STUDY

In the late 1990s, prostitution had become an issue of increasing concern to law enforcement officials, women's organizations, and community members. The presence of prostitution negatively affected the livability of neighborhoods, potentially harmed local businesses, and was associated with illicit drug use and other vice. Prostitutes were at high risk of contracting human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) and other sexually transmitted diseases (STDs), and prostitution had the potential to become a vector for the transmission of STDs to clients and their spouses or partners. Perhaps most significantly, prostitutes themselves were frequent victims of violent crimes. Research and policy had focused attention primarily on prostitutes rather than on their clients. In 1995, two creative programs, Portland's Sexual Exploitation Education Project (SEEP) and San Francisco's First Offender Prostitution Program (FOPP), began to address the issue of prostitution differently, focusing prevention efforts on the demand side of the supply/demand equation, the clients of prostitutes. The overwhelming majority of men in these cities who were arrested for paying or attempting to pay for sex participated in the intervention programs. Some were required to attend the program as part of their sentence, while others received reduced fines or had the arrest purged from their records in exchange for their attendance. Using data gathered from men attending such programs, this study sought to provide information about this otherwise inaccessible population. In particular, this project sought to collect information about the background characteristics, attitudes, and reported behaviors of arrested clients, with particular attention to the issue of violent crime against women. The project was designed to answer the following questions: (1) What are the background characteristics of men who solicit prostitution? How do they differ from a representative sample of men? (2) What types of sex-related behaviors characterize men who solicit prostitution? (3) Why do men visit prostitutes? How consistent are their motivations with scholarly and popular understandings of the prostitution client? (4) What are the attitudes of prostitution clients toward violence against women? (5) What are the consequences of conceiving of sexuality as a commodity? (6) What are rates of recidivism for participants in prostitution client intervention programs?

METHODS

STUDY DESIGN

Client intervention programs provided an unprecedented opportunity to gather information from the previously inaccessible population of men arrested for trying to hire street prostitutes. For this study, a detailed anonymous questionnaire was administered to men before the beginning of every client intervention workshop in San Francisco, California, and Portland, Oregon. The questionnaire was also administered at a small program in Santa Clara, California, which was modeled after the San Francisco program. During the course of the study, the Portland program ceased operations and a new program began in Las Vegas, which became a significant source of data. Both English and Spanish versions of the questionnaire were used when the researchers gathered the data.

SOURCES OF INFORMATION

Data were collected from self-administered questionnaires.

SAMPLE

The study employed a simple convenience sampling method, gathering data from all of the consenting participants of each of the community-initiated prevention programs. Over 80 percent of participants completed questionnaires. Though refusals constituted the largest single category of noncompletions, language barriers and late arrivals also accounted for a substantial proportion. Of these 1,342 respondents, 36 from San Francisco and 15 from Las Vegas completed a Spanish-language version of the questionnaire. Completing the English version of the questionnaire were 950 men from San Francisco, 254 from Las Vegas, 77 from Portland, and 10 from Santa Clara.

DATE(S) OF DATA COLLECTION

1997 to 1999

SUMMARY OF CONTENTS

DESCRIPTION OF VARIABLES

Men were asked about their sexual behavior, including the number and type of partners, frequency of sex, interest in pornography, age and circumstances of first sexual encounter with a prostitute, sexual acts performed with prostitutes, and condom use with prostitutes. Clients were also asked about their attitudes toward premarital sex, homosexual sex, extramarital sex, and sex between adults and children. Other questions probed men's views about prostitutes, the legality of prostitution, and violence against women. Background information gathered on clients included race, educational level, sexual orientation, marital status, work status, socioeconomic status, age, parents' marital status, history of sexual or physical abuse, military service, relationship history, and sexual preferences.

PRESENCE OF COMMON SCALES

Several Likert-type scales were used.

UNIT OF OBSERVATION

Individuals.

EXTENT OF PROCESSING

Missing data codes were standardized by the data producer. ICPSR performed checks for undocumented codes and generated SAS and SPSS data definition statements and a codebook for this collection.

EXTENT OF COLLECTION

This data collection consists of one data file with a machine-readable user guide, codebook, and data collection instrument in one PDF file, and SAS and SPSS data definition statements.

DATA COLLECTION NOTES

(1) The site variable in this file was blanked for confidentiality reasons. Users are not able to identify the name or location of the programs which individual respondents attended. (2) The codebook, user guide, and data collection instrument are provided as a Portable Document Format (PDF) file. The PDF file format was developed by Adobe Systems Incorporated and can be accessed using PDF reader software, such as the Adobe Acrobat Reader. Information on how to obtain a copy of the Acrobat Reader is provided on the ICPSR Website.

DATA RESOURCES PROGRAM ON THE INTERNET

The National Institute of Justice Data Resources Program (DRP) makes datasets from NIJ-funded research and evaluation projects available to the research community and sponsors research and training activities devoted to secondary data analysis. Datasets are archived by the National Archive of Criminal Justice Data (NACJD) at the Inter-university Consortium for Political and Social Research (ICPSR) at the University of Michigan.

The NACJD maintains a World Wide Web site with instructions for transferring files and sending messages. Criminal justice data funded by the Department of Justice are available via the Internet at this site at no charge to the user. NACJD may be contacted at NACJD/ICPSR, P.O.
