Graduation + Equity: Finding a Formula That Works

Tim Stensager

Low-income students graduate from high school less often than non-low-income students. Some school districts have overcome this disparity. They maintain high graduation rates for this group. What are they doing that leads to student success? Attendees will learn from four larger school districts that have high graduation rates for all students. These "outlier" districts will share their stories of success.

SUNDAY, JUNE 26 (Continued)

Feedback Conversations for Professional Growth

Anzara Miller and Becky Lee

Through our work with the teacher evaluation process, we have learned the value of using instructional frameworks and data to support professional growth. We can increase that growth by extending our knowledge, skills, and strategies for engaging in productive conversations with our teachers. The Learning-Focused Supervision practiced in this session will help participants learn to leverage conversations that engage teachers' thinking about their teaching. We will explore the use of templates and tools to increase our effectiveness and efficiency while inviting the teacher to be a partner in continuous learning and improvement of their practice.

Building Resiliency in the Classroom: Tools for Working with Students around Adverse Experiences

Dr. Jodi McVittie

This workshop links the brain science of adverse experiences with practical tools to build powerful learning communities. The tools are particularly effective with students who have experienced trauma. Participants will leave with a strong understanding how trauma impacts the brain and how that impacts student behavior and learning.
