Olympic Sponsors vs. Protestors

This summer will feature an intense battle between the brands that have paid tens of millions of pounds to be associated with the Olympics and use its values to improve their own, and those who believe that their presence will demand more attention than the Games themselves.

It is a battle that has been going on on a regular basis for months as people protest against Dow Chemical's sponsorship of the Games since they believe it has outstanding liabilities* relating to the 1984 Bhopal disaster.

These protesters are about to be joined by "greenwash" campaigners targeting other sponsors including BP and Rio Tinto as well as protesters against familiar targets including McDonalds and Coca-Cola. Others still will use the Games to push their own causes.

The big brands have paid a lot for the right to do much the same. They have the cash for big consumer campaigns but have also used the Olympics as the basis for corporate social responsibility and staff engagement programmes that seek to improve their corporate image or underline their brand values.

"If this Olympic Games is really to leave a legacy for the future, we hope it will have an impact on future sponsorship deals. BP have gained a huge amount from their sponsorship of the Olympics in financial and PR terms. It's depressing. It's a sick joke," said Harry Broadbent of CAMSOL.

Mike Sharrock, BP's partnership director for London 2012, said: "What we'll try and do is just focus on what we're doing. We're confident our contribution is a positive one. What we have tried to do is make sure that everything we're doing is credible and authentic."

While sponsors will have to invest substantially in maintaining their deals, which cost up to £40m a time in the first place, the tactics used by protest groups will be more opportunistic, utilising social media, PR stunts and, potentially, disruption of events such as the marathon and cycling road race.

As the Dow scandal and the controversy over the percentage of tickets that go to corporates have shown, Locog (London Organising Committee for the Games) will fight strongly to support the sponsors that have contributed £700m to the £2bn costs of staging the Games. The London 2012 chief executive, Paul Deighton, told the Guardian its approach would effectively be to ignore protesters while also planning to deal swiftly and seriously with any invasion of the field of play.

Police have said they will facilitate peaceful protest but are expected to show strong force against any attempt to disrupt the action or block the 30 miles of exclusive Games Lanes that will help carry VIPs, sponsors, competitors, officials and the media around the capital.

With a number of direct action groups promising disruption during the Games, one thing seems certain: the optimistic prediction of Boris Johnson that this would be an Olympics unmarked by protest is unlikely to be true.
