Conference Overview

The global antimony industry has undergone several rounds of downward price adjustments amid plentiful global supply and weaker demand, sending prices lower compared with this time last year. Buyers and sellers expect the antimony market to bottom out soon, especially in light of the recent rebound driven by producers and traders.

There is an increased tendency for global consumers to deal with Chinese producers directly, rather than through traders. A new trend is also emerging for antimony producers to become more reluctant to agree deals at prices below their expectations, while smaller antimony smelters are finding it more difficult to meet delivery requests in the absence of easy access to adequate feedstock supplies.

China remains both the largest producer and consumer of antimony minerals and also the largest exporter of antimony products such as ingot and ATO. Despite weaker demand growth, trading opportunities still abound.

Early Confirmed Speakers

- Nigel Tunna, Vice President, Argus
- Michael Schmidt, German Mineral Resources Agency (DERA), Federal Institute for Geosciences and Natural Resources (BGR)
- John P. Sykes, Director, Greenfields Research Ltd
- Zhou Zhengmao, Secretary General, China Flame Retardant Society
- Mikhail Fedchik, CFO, GPM Chemicresource

“The prestigious annual global market intelligence and networking event for the antimony industry”

Key Topics of Debate

- ▶ How will the global antimony market play out in 2016-17 and how can the global antimony community engage with the Chinese antimony industry?
- ▶ With stricter mining regulations and quota management being put in place in China, how is the supply picture developing and what does the future hold for traders, producers and buyers of antimony products?
- ▶ Is China’s “supply side reform” (供给侧改革) a silver bullet to solve the industry’s fundamental problem of an imbalance between supply and demand?
- ▶ What are the emerging opportunities from new antimony applications?

“If you are looking to expand your potential client base in 2016 and 2017, this conference gives you the best opportunity for market branding.”

Why will delegates attend Argus CMW Antimony 2016?

- Meet with Chinese and international antimony miners and producers, traders and industrial users, as well as analysts
- Share experiences with fellow market participants and find out how to manage business operations in a slow market
- Discover the impact of China’s latest non-ferrous metal industry policies on the global supply chain
- Learn about the latest market development and trends in the global antimony industry
- Build relationships with major producers of minor metals for investment and business development opportunities
- Hear updates on key industry developments from leading market participants
