The person who files first for divorce is called the plaintiff. This person' name will be listed first on all documents.

The person who the action is being filed against is the defendant. The defendant's name will always appear second on the documents.

All children born to the parties must be listed with dates of birth.

This is the date that the action actually begins in court and the plaintiff's appearance must be filed by. This date mainly concerns the plaintiff and what they must do

The complaint must state that you have lived in Connecticut prior to filing for the past year. This grants the Court the ability to hear your case. If both you and your spouse have not lived in Connecticut, the court may not be able to hear and decide your case.

This is the courthouse that will hear your case and have jurisdiction over your matter. The courthouse is typically determined by where you and your spouse reside.

Connecticut is a "no-fault" divorce state. This means you do not need to list the reasons why your marriage broke down. "Broken down irretrievably" is the standard language used to show the marriage has ended without listing details.

At the end of the complaint you must list what you are looking for. Specifics are not required at this time, but a general list, also know as a claim for relief is necessary. If you are seeking a restoration of a maiden name, it goes in this section. If you are seeking alimony, this is requested. If you waive alimony it is gone forever. You can always choose to waive some of the relief requested later.

LadyDivorce's Guide to Understanding a Divorce Complaint

The court needs to know if the parties or the children have received aid from the state. If so, the State also needs to be notified of the divorce proceedings

This is a catch-all paragraph which allows the lawyers and court to make changes to what is ordered or requested as the case gets decided
