Dealer Licensing Act Temporary Registrations

1 – Temporary certificates of registration are only valid for 30 days from the date of issuance. A temporary certificate of registration issued by a dealer to a purchaser will automatically expire when DMV issues a certificate of title for the vehicle. If the dealer fails to produce a certificate of title or a certificate of origin, or fails to apply for a replacement certificate of title, the purchaser's interest in the vehicle may terminate and the purchaser may return the vehicle to the dealer, provided that certain conditions are met, and obtain a full refund of all payment made towards the purchase of the vehicle, less any damage to the vehicle and less a reasonable amount for use, not to exceed one-half the amount allowed per mile by the Internal Revenue Service.

2 – If the certificate of title or certificate of origin is not produced within thirty days, the dealer must submit the application for title, a copy of the bill of sale, fees and a written statement of facts. A second temporary certificate may then be issued. If the dealer does not produce the certificate of title or certificate of origin before the second temporary certificate expires, the purchaser's rights to the vehicle may terminate as outlined in Item 1 above.

3 – If the dealer is unable to produce the certificate of title or certificate of origin within the sixty-day period from the date of issuance of the first temporary certificate, the Department may extend temporary registration for one additional period of up to ninety days, provided the dealer makes application in the format required by DMV. If the dealer does not produce the certificate of title or certificate of origin to the vehicle before the expiration of the additional ninety-day period, the purchaser's interest in the vehicle may terminate as outlined in Item 1 above.
